NEW QUESTION: 1

Extinction is a process that can depend on a variety of ecological, geographical, and physiological variables. These variables affect different species of organisms in different ways, and should, therefore, yield a random pattern of extinctions. However, the fossil record shows that extinction occurs in a surprisingly definite pattern, with many species vanishing at the same time.

Which of the following, if true, forms the best basis for at least a partial explanation of the patterned extinctions revealed by the fossil record?

A. Certain extinction episodes selectively affect organisms with particular sets of characteristics unique to their species.

B. In geologically recent times, for which there is no fossil record, human intervention has changed the pattern of extinctions.

C. Some species become extinct because of accumulated gradual changes in their local environments.

D. Species that are widely dispersed are the least likely to become extinct.

E. Major episodes of extinction can result from widespread environmental disturbances that affect numerous different species.
